The crisis is being reached in the Y. M. C. A. campaign. There are but four more working days in January, and the clock hands stand at $140,045, leaving sixty thousand dollars to be raised before next thousand dollars to be raised before next Thursdy night. Unless some large subscriptions come in Monday or Tuesday, it will be an uphill pull; but the force of canvassers are by no means discouraged. The suggestion was made last night that since it would be necessary to raise fifteen thousand dollars a day for four days, possibly some one who his not yet contributed would undertake one whole day by authorizing a subscription of fifteen thousand. If one or two of this sort could be secured, the minds of the workers would be greatly relieved as to securing the conditional piedges, which become void if the two hundred thousand mark is not reached by Thursday night.

The committee in charge of the campaign issued a statement last night, asking for volunteers for the next four days of the eampaign, to report at headquarters on, Monday morning. The statement goes on to say:

"The expectations of the Y. M. C. A. campaign committee were realized in part last night when the executive committee was able to announce that the grand total was past the $140,000 mark. This leaves $60,000 to be raised in four days. It will only be done by the co-operation

From his letter in 1863 the list passes to 1865. From the 1865 collection the fol-lowing paragraphs from a letter of Mrs. Jefferson Davis to Horace Greeley, dated June 22, 1865, shows her anguish of mind over her husband's sufferings. It is writ-ten with the hope of probably procuring some amelioration of his condition, and says in part: savs in part:

some amelioration of his condition, and says in part:

"With all the archives of our government in the hands of your government, do they despair of proving him a rogue, faisified assassia and traitor; that they must in addition guard him like a wild beast, and chain him for fear his unarmed hands will in a casemated cell subvert the government?

"There is not a man, I will venture to sany, among the better class of your people, who in his heart helieves Mr. Davis to be guilty of the crimes so faisely imputed to him. Is no one among you hold enough to defend him? Will no one of influence stand forth and demand where the money is, with which he was found running off to a foreign country?"

Other 1885 papers include letters from Mrs. C. C. Clay, and to Mrs. Clay, in relation to the trial of her husband, and from O'Conor and Shea, Greeley and Joseph Davis, in regard to Jefferson Davis.

Miss Shea is the daughter of the late flon. George Shea. The above picture shows her seated in her jinricksha at Yokohama, she having spent the time from November of 1994 to the year 1906 in the Orient.

when Miss Shea was a child she accompanied her father in his visits to Jefferson Davis then imprisoned at Fortress Monroe. She retains the most distinct impressions of Mr. Davis, and speaks of him with great sympathy and respect. Miss Shea possesses a most engaging personality, and won the hearts of all those fortunate enough to make her acquaintance during her recent visit to Richmond. The officers and members of the Confederate Memorial Literary Society are very grateful and appreciative of Miss Shea's valuable gift, which they prize for her's and her father's sake, and for the sake of history.

Mr. Shea was Chief Justice of the Ma-

Mr. Shea was Chief Justice of the Marine Court of New York from 1870 to 1882, and associate counsel with Charles O'Conor in defending Jefferson Davis, It was largely due to Mr. Shea's untiring afforts, in raising the money and procuring the signatures to the bail-bond that Mr. Davis was freed from imprisonment. The first visit paid by Mr. Davis after his release was to the beautiful Shea hame in New York. The Southern people have always felt the sincerest respect and esteem for the talented jurist and humanitarian, whose large heart and broad sympathies moved him to interpose his influence and intellect as a shield to save from further suffering the President of the Southern Confederacy, whom he believed to be most unjustly treated.
